I think that, in the settlement of the U.S. vs Microsoft federal case, the example of the settlement criteria proposed by another suit brought by 7 states in a class action action against Microsoft should be followed. This would be more like what a settlement should be, with a more significant penalty for violations Microsoft has been found guilty of.

In addition, since the software is free, Microsoft software developers should be required to work closely with developers of Linux. Especially the Linux developers working on WINE, the Windows emulator for Linux. More of the economically disadvantaged would get a better break if Linux could run Windows programs.
